Slide 10

Think In Threes Activity

Allow 15 minutes for this activity.

Objective: For this individual activity, participants will identify the activities they are familiar with or currently use in their health and life skills curriculum. By noting the objectives and traits these activities target, they can evaluate how each activity works at building good student character.

Instructions: Ask participants to read the directions in the slide. Have them write their answers in their notebooks or on their PowerPoint handouts.

Debrief: Ask two or three participants to share their answers with the whole group. After sharing, mention that what the participants shared are examples of many other character building activities that can be used in health and life skills classes.

In the next part of this workshop, you will be able to take note of more activities and nprove on those you alre	eady know.

Slide 14

Here, you will ask students to bring in photos of themselves. Photos should be from their infant, toddler, and elementary years, all the way up to current photos. These can be displayed on your classroom bulletin board to show how the students have changed over the years.

This activity helps you talk about the physical, behavioral, and intellectual changes that your students have so far experienced. It also allows your students to predict other bodily changes they will have in their lives. You will need to explain how change is a natural occurrence that we cannot always control.

Self-Awareness, Self Esteem. This is also a chance for educators to emphasize students' self-awareness and self-esteem by teaching them how to deal with the changes they will experience—for instance, through proper hygiene and health habits, especially during adolescence—or by having students appreciate the physical characteristics that make each person unique.

Tell participants that Handout 1 provides further details about this activity.
